Kirkby Moor - Wikipedia

en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kirkby_Moor - キャッシュ

Kirkby Moor is a poorly defined moorland area in southern Cumbria, England, named after the village of Kirkby-in-Furness, but stretching both sides of the A5092 road, and thus spanning the border of the Lake District National Park. The highest area, to the south of the road, and therefore outside the national park, is named Lowick High Common on Ordnance Survey maps, but "Kirkby Moor" is more commonly but incorrectly used. Lowick High common is the first UK SOTA summit to be ...

2017年12月7日 - A REJECTION of the plan to extend the life span of the wind farm on Kirkby Moor has been hailed as a triumph for local democracy. On Tuesday (5) members of the South Lakeland District Council planning committee turned down a request to keep the turbines turning until 2027. In a packed out Coronation Hall in Ulverston, the vote to refuse was carried by six votes to five. More than 20 residents and local councillors spoke out against the plan, imploring committee ...

Time runs out for Kirkby Moor wind farm

By Staff reporter on 06/12/2017 | Cumbria Crack | www.cumbriacrack.com

Friends of the Lake District welcome the decision by South Lakeland District Council Planning Committee to refuse the application by Zephyr Investments to retain the turbines on Kirby Moor, on the Furness peninsula, Cumbria, until 31st March 2027.

While recognising the importance of renewable energy development in providing clean energy sources, membership charity Friends of the Lake District believes that these turbines have served their purpose and are now at the end of their working life. Throughout their 25 years operation, the turbines have a significant detrimental impact on the landscape and, in particular on the setting of the Lake District National Park which is now a World Heritage Site.
